Dear Traveler,

Throughout my years sailing aboard the Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic fleet, I've enjoyed countless opportunities to take in the wild thrills of our natural world with travelers like you. These moments of shared discovery—and the stories we share with one another on expedition—kindle the unique camaraderie and community that form on board our ships.

At the heart of this community are the expert naturalists, photo instructors, captains, chefs, and many others who make our voyages exceptional. Each of them has their own incredible stories to share—and so, we're dedicating this edition of Explorations to shedding light on their remarkable histories and achievements. Without their expertise—which is, frankly, unmatched in expedition travel—we simply wouldn't be able to do what we do: take you deeper into wild places safely and in supreme comfort for the most immersive and transformative experience possible.

In the following pages, you'll read about people like Socrates Tomala, an expedition leader who has participated in conservation projects in the Galápagos since he was a young child, and now shares his decades' worth of knowledge with travelers in the archipelago. There's also Kim Nesbitt, an undersea specialist who regularly informs researchers about the surprising—and sometimes previously unknown—marine species she documents for our guests in uncharted waters.

These and our many other impressive officers, staff, and crew will be taking us on some incredible adventures in the upcoming seasons. I'm especially excited about our new Antarctic itineraries, which allow travelers to save time by flying over the Drake Passage. In addition to our traditional, longer voyages, you'll now have the option to fly the passage both ways on an 8-day itinerary or to sail in and fly out on our 10-day voyage.

I'd also like to share our future plans for National Geographic Orion. The 2024 season will be her last in Asia and Oceania for the foreseeable future, so I encourage you to take this final opportunity to gain unique perspectives on places like Indonesia and French Polynesia alongside experts like Cultural Specialist and Traditional Master Navigator Tua Pittman, who you'll also meet in the following pages. Beginning in 2025, the ship will be sailing to the Mediterranean, coastal Africa, and beyond on a series of enriching new voyages that reveal these regions' lesser-known treasures through the unique lens of Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic.

I hope you enjoy getting to know our team a bit better. Many of you have told me that you come back to Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic for them. And the truth is, they come back for you. They know that our travelers are the most passionate about the world around us—you inspire them to dig deeper into our destinations, just as they inspire us to get out there and see even more of our wild planet.

Sincerely,

Sven-Olof Lindblad

New Horizons for National Geographic Orion

We are thrilled to announce that National Geographic Orion will chart a new course in 2025, taking travelers on a series of immersive expeditions to destinations both new and known to our fleet, from the Mediterranean to Mozambique.

The 2025 arrival of National Geographic Orion in the Mediterranean marks an exciting chapter in our travels: the long-awaited return of our fleet to Turkey, with the voyage Crossroads of the Ancient World: Exploring Greece and Turkey. We'll also discover a timeless destination through a new perspective on Greek Isles Odyssey: Mythology, History, and Cerulean Seas, which journeys to storied and secret shores—from iconic Santorini to fabled Serifos—for an in-depth exploration of Cycladic culture.

Venture to emerging European destinations on Treasures of the Adriatic: Croatia's Dalmatian Coast and Montenegro to discover one of the continent's most enchanting rivieras, where Venetian towns meet lush forests and turquoise seas. Or, delve into legendary empires and iconic landmarks on Ancient Mediterranean Odyssey: Exploring Greece, Croatia, and Albania.

National Geographic Orion also continues her rich tradition of journeying to distant, lesser-known shores. Booking details will be released in the coming months for expeditions to the idyllic Seychelles; captivating destinations across coastal Africa, including Madagascar, Mozambique, and South Africa; Atlantic isles, from the Azores to Madeira; and lesser-known Caribbean islands like Antigua.

Final Call for Voyages to Asia and Oceania

Before sailing on to new adventures, National Geographic Orion will host our final season in Asia and Oceania for the foreseeable future. In 2024 or 2025, take the opportunity to experience the tropical splendor and vibrant cultures of these unspoiled regions on voyages driven by the spirit of discovery.

Among the alluring options is a new voyage: Journey Through Southeast Asia: Singapore, Thailand, Indonesia, and Malaysia, where we'll discover idyllic Thai isles, the orangutans of wild Sumatra, and more. Voyage down under on Coastal New Zealand: Scenic Fjords, Maori History, and Abundant Wildlife or our Kimberley Expedition: Northwest Australia and Indonesia. We've also added more departures of one of our most popular voyages, Pearls of the Pacific: Exploring the Society and Tuamotu Islands, so more travelers can experience the archipelagos' flourishing coral gardens, otherworldly grottos, and fascinating sacred sites before the season's end. Other opportunities include expeditions to Fiji, Papua New Guinea, French Polynesia, and more. (See pages 106-123 to browse itineraries.)

A New Way to Discover Antarctica: Fly the Drake Passage

Our upcoming Antarctic travel season offers guests two exciting new ways to experience the wonders of the White Continent with a pair of time-efficient itineraries that fly over the Drake Passage.

As the pioneers of polar expedition travel, Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic deeply understands the life-changing nature of an Antarctic voyage—and we are continuously seeking out ways to introduce more people to the grandeur at the bottom of the globe. With the introduction of two new itineraries that allow travelers to save time by flying over the Drake Passage in one or both directions, we invite you to chart a new course with us to the world's last great wilderness.

The runway on King George Island

Aboard the intimately scaled and recently refurbished guest-favorite National Geographic Explorer, embark on the 8-day Antarctica Direct: Fly the Drake Passage voyage, which takes you by air to and from the continent. For travelers who want to expedite their expedition, but still check off the milestone of crossing the Drake Passage, there is also the 10-day Antarctica Direct: Sail and Fly the Drake Passage. On this option, guests will voyage to the continent aboard National Geographic Explorer, and fly back to South America at the end of their journey.

Expertise is Everything

After more than five decades exploring the wildest and most remote places on Earth, we've learned many things—like how to navigate the rocky outcrops of an Alaskan shoreline; how to quietly observe epic creatures like orcas and polar bears in their natural habitats; how to design groundbreaking excursions like polar kayaking; and how to cultivate meaningful relationships with people on shore so that our presence has a positive impact. These learnings come from experience—doing something many times over and taking notes on what worked and what didn't—until that experience becomes expertise.

Nowhere is our expertise more evident than in the expedition team members that helm our voyages. Collectively, they make up the most versatile team in expedition cruising—from the expedition leaders and captains working in lockstep to maximize exploration opportunities, to the naturalists and cultural specialists who help illuminate your surroundings, to the hotel

Driven by passion: More than 110 members of our expedition team have worked with Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic for more than 10 years, while 60 team members have been with us for 20 years or more.

managers and chefs who ensure that your experience on board is supremely comfortable and reflects the flavors, sights, and sounds of your destination.

Wherever you set sail with us, these extraordinary individuals work tirelessly to ensure that your experience is unforgettable. They provide context and insights, shared joy and wonder, new ways of seeing—and, of course, good company in places far from home.

The people featured on the following pages are just a few of the team members you may meet when you travel with us. They hail from all over the world and have diverse backgrounds and degrees, but they all share an abiding passion for the wild wonders of the Earth—and for sharing that passion with you, our guests.

Captain

CHARTING A COURSE FOR DISCOVERY ABOARD OUR SMALL, PURPOSE-BUILT EXPEDITION SHIPS

Martin Graser

25 years of experience

For Martin Graser, captain aboard National Geographic Resolution, Antarctica is the most beautiful place on Earth—and the ideal environment for the dynamic and immersive expedition experience that Lindblad Expeditions pioneered more than 50 years ago. “It’s such a fluid environment; there is not a season or even a single expedition that is the same. From voyage to voyage, the weather changes, the ice changes—and so, your choices are different.”

Captain Graser has spent his entire career on the water. Fond childhood memories of family vacations on the Baltic and North Seas aboard his father’s hand-built sailboat led him to a now decades-long nautical career. He started out as a ship mechanic, rising through the ranks aboard cargo vessels and large cruise ships until a stroke of luck led him to expedition cruising in 1999. “Someone left out a brochure on the bridge. I thought, ‘This looks interesting.’”

With Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic, the captain is responsible for more than just getting from point A to point B; they work closely with the expedition leader to assess conditions and various options, making real-time decisions about the itinerary to provide guests with the best possible expedition experience. “Being the captain of an expedition ship is an adventure. It’s the only captain’s job where you influence the course of the voyage.” For Captain Graser, this flexible and nimble approach, coupled with the recent launch of two new state-of-the-art polar ships (National Geographic Resolution and her sister ship, National Geographic Endurance), defines the company’s innovative approach to polar exploration.

“Someone asked me recently if expeditions are better now than when I started more than 20 years ago. Unequivocally yes—we have better tools, better weather forecasting, better charts, better depth sounding, and of course, better ships.” All these improvements mean better access and an unprecedented ability to safely go further into remote polar regions.

“In Antarctica, we can choose to explore the Weddell Sea or go south of the polar circle. These are very rare experiences that other companies just can’t offer. It’s our goal to get far away from the central part of the peninsula where other cruise ships tend to congregate. We want to make sure our guests have an unforgettable expedition—that they see things very few people ever get to see.”

“With Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic, the captain is responsible for more than just getting from point A to point B; they work closely with the expedition leader to assess conditions and various options, making real-time decisions about the itinerary to provide guests with the best possible expedition experience.”

THE SEASONED EXPLORERS WHO HARNESS OUR PIONEERING SPIRIT TO ORCHESTRATE TRANSFORMATIVE EXPEDITION EXPERIENCES

“When you are with Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic travelers, you are going to get questions from many different angles, and those questions are going to come from genuine interest and curiosity.”

Margrit Ulrich

23 years of experience

Margrit Ulrich knows the key to conservation is a good story—which is why she avoids academic talk on expeditions, favoring instead the power of an engaging narrative. “It’s one thing to read something in a schoolbook, but it’s another to be here in real life with the cicadas buzzing as you observe a beautiful endemic bird a few branches away. I want guests to remember what a healthy rainforest looks like and take its stories back home with them.”

After 23 years with Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic, Ulrich has made countless storytellers of visitors to her Costa Rican homeland, where flourishing canopies show what’s possible when the government goes green. Thanks to sweeping policy initiatives, the country was the first to reverse deforestation; more than 50 percent of its forests have been restored following a harmful cattle-ranching era in the mid-20th century.

In Ulrich’s opinion, big change can also happen when you change a single mind. “If you can teach someone about conservation, there’s a ripple effect. On our expeditions, we learn how the world’s species depend on one another to thrive. These lessons are not just about saving the planet, they’re about saving ourselves.”

Socrates Tomala

20 years of experience

Raised in the Galápagos in the 1980s, Socrates Tomala recalls a time when there were hardly any expedition ships in the archipelago—and far too many goats and pigs. Invasive to the islands, both animals once wreaked havoc on the delicate ecosystems, clearing vegetation and disrupting the food chain.

Thanks in part to a financial influx from tourism, conservationists have succeeded in eradicating the interlopers, allowing endemic creatures like giant tortoises to thrive once again. Tomala reflects: “A lot of things we're doing now, we couldn't have even dreamed of back then, because we didn't have the funding.”

Preservation of the islands is personal for Tomala. From a young age, he lent a hand with conservation projects in his own Santa Cruz community, tagging

Pacific green sea turtles and putting transmitters on sharks to help track wildlife populations. “I would do coastal cleanups and see people there from Lindblad, and think to myself, ‘wow, they're taking real action—they actually care.’”

It's that commitment to conservation that led Tomala to our team in 2016. “I liked Lindblad's model of traveling to create awareness and to support conservation initiatives. I tell guests about the work we do to balance Galápagos ecosystems and conserve wildlife so they leave with an understanding that the world is fragile and that they can take action no matter where they live. It really matters, because everything is interconnected. We're all part of the same planet.”

“Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic has long-standing relationships in the Galápagos. They open the door for first-hand engagement with scientists, researchers, explorers, and authors. I don't think there's any other way to get exposure like that.”

COMMITMENT TO CONSERVATION

Together with our travelers, the Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic Fund has invested more than $22 million to protect our oceans, restore marine and coastal habitats, and foster environmental stewardship around the world.

Naturalist

THE ENGAGING GUIDES WITH DEEP KNOWLEDGE OF YOUR DESTINATION'S NATURAL HISTORY

Anahi Concari

7 years of experience

One of Anahi Concari's earliest memories is snorkeling with sharks—roughly 20 of the whitetip reef variety, off the coast of her Galápagos home. "Living here and seeing people so confident among the wildlife—and the wildlife completely unfazed by people—you learn not to be scared of anything," she says.

Concari has always kept wild company. Growing up on Santa Cruz Island, she was free to roam with giant tortoises and sunbathe among marine iguanas. She also spent plenty of time at the Charles Darwin Research Station, where the resident scientists and environmental educators—including her mother—helped her with homework.

Now a naturalist on our Galápagos expeditions, she orchestrates thrilling encounters for guests, offering knowledge and context for the wild creatures she cherishes. She also makes scientific contributions of her own, recording and reporting what she sees in the field to inform species and habitat research.

"Sharing my home with travelers is always giving me new perspectives on things that were just normal for me. Seeing guests get so excited about giant tortoises and sea lions has helped me to see them through their eyes and appreciate them even more."

"I can't count how many times I've said to guests, 'This is the first time I've ever seen this.' There are so many incredible new behaviors—nature is changing before our eyes."

Zoey Greenberg

6 years of experience

Zoey Greenberg has been known to put her face next to the muddy nest of a burrowing clam in Alaska to guide young guests through a lesson on shellfish adaptations. In Panama, you might find her mimicking the courtship calls of her favorite tropical bird, or reciting a poem she wrote on rainforest biodiversity. According to Greenberg, "There are a lot of different kinds of wisdom out there—and there are infinite ways to share and engage with that wisdom, if you're willing to get creative with it."

Born in the mountains of Colorado to parents who fostered a deep love of nature and encouraged self-determination,

Greenberg credits her non-traditional upbringing for her playfully creative approach to her role. She believes that learning is personal—and she keeps that belief top of mind when guiding guests from ages eight to 80.

"If you can read your audience quickly, you can teach to their learning style—whether they prefer an auditory way of teaching or something more hands-on or kinesthetic. I really love seeing 'aha moments' on people's faces—seeing minds blown at any age. It's a big privilege of being a naturalist, especially if you're helping facilitate those moments."

Certified Photo Instructor

HELPING YOU CAPTURE THE PHOTOS OF A LIFETIME
ON YOUR ADVENTURE OF A LIFETIME

Michael Nolan

38 years of experience

Veteran wildlife photographer Michael Nolan has embraced the smartphone revolution. At the start of his career, Nolan would scrutinize images in National Geographic magazine, trying to figure out the formula for a successful photo. With the modern-day ubiquity of handheld devices and the daily inundation of images on social media, he's now more focused on stopping the scroll. "The challenge is to make something that you want to slow down for."

Nolan, a Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic certified photo instructor, shares his learnings with guests during onboard photography talks and in the field—for instance, when a group happens upon a scarlet macaw or a pod of leaping dolphins. He is happy to report that smartphones have made photography more accessible to travelers, which has sparked increased interest in his programming.

Despite crisscrossing the globe for a living, Nolan says there is still no shortage of wonder to capture. "I've been to Antarctica 67 times, and I hope to go 67 more. I've seen literally tens of thousands of penguins and humpback whales, and it's still exciting for me because our guests may be seeing them for the first time, and I get to help them capture the memory. That's a big part of what keeps me going."

THE MOST EXPERIENCED TEAM

Undersea Specialist

BRINGING THE WONDERS OF THE UNDERSEA TO THE SURFACE ON NEARLY EVERY VOYAGE

Kim Nesbitt

7 years of experience

Kim Nesbitt's favorite dive spots may surprise you. She can take or leave warm turquoise seas; it's the chilly waters that thrill her. "There is plenty of beauty in tropical waters, but the temperate regions have evolved over a longer period of time and are more resilient. When I dive in places like Alaska and British Columbia, I'm happy to see thriving kelp forests, keystone species, and even critically endangered creatures."

As an undersea specialist, Nesbitt records marine realms across the globe using our arsenal of onboard tools, including a remotely operated vehicle (ROV) for filming the deep. She is also a dedicated citizen scientist who regularly contributes her images to apps like iNaturalist—and she encourages travelers to do the same.

Nesbitt's submissions run the gamut. In Alaska alone, she has reported a fish and a jelly species far outside their normal range. Her passion for the region's cold-water creatures tends to rub off on inquisitive travelers. "People are interested in these resilient animals because they're so alien. Guests never expect to go home with dozens of pictures of a jellyfish."

SEE BENEATH THE SURFACE

Learn more about our undersea program in this video featuring program Director Ashley Knight.

James Hyde

10 years of experience

No two dives are the same for James Hyde—and that's by design. "If you only look for animals that you already know, that's all you'll see. But if you have the intention of discovering something weird and unusual, you can. There's always something. Always."

At a time when space tourism captivates the collective imagination, Hyde endorses an exploration frontier closer to home. He explains there are still many mysteries in the ocean, where only 25% of the seafloor has been mapped. Hyde and his dive partner use depth sounders for scoping out uncharted waters on expeditions. Together, they gather imagery to share with guests during the nightly recap. "Generally, there are no records of people diving in these places, so much of our footage is likely unique."

In many places, guests can also take part in underwater exploration during snorkeling or diving excursions. Hyde encourages everyone to jump in: "You feel so alive under water. I think it helps you develop a much stronger connection to your destinations and offers a window onto a critically important part of its ecosystem."

Cultural Specialist

FOSTERING MEANINGFUL CONNECTIONS WITH THE PEOPLE WE MEET IN OUR DESTINATIONS

Tua Pittman

16 years of experience

When Tua Pittman is not introducing guests aboard National Geographic Orion to the cultural history of the Polynesian people, you might find him on a traditional voyaging canoe, using only the sun, wind, and stars to navigate expanses of the Pacific Ocean.

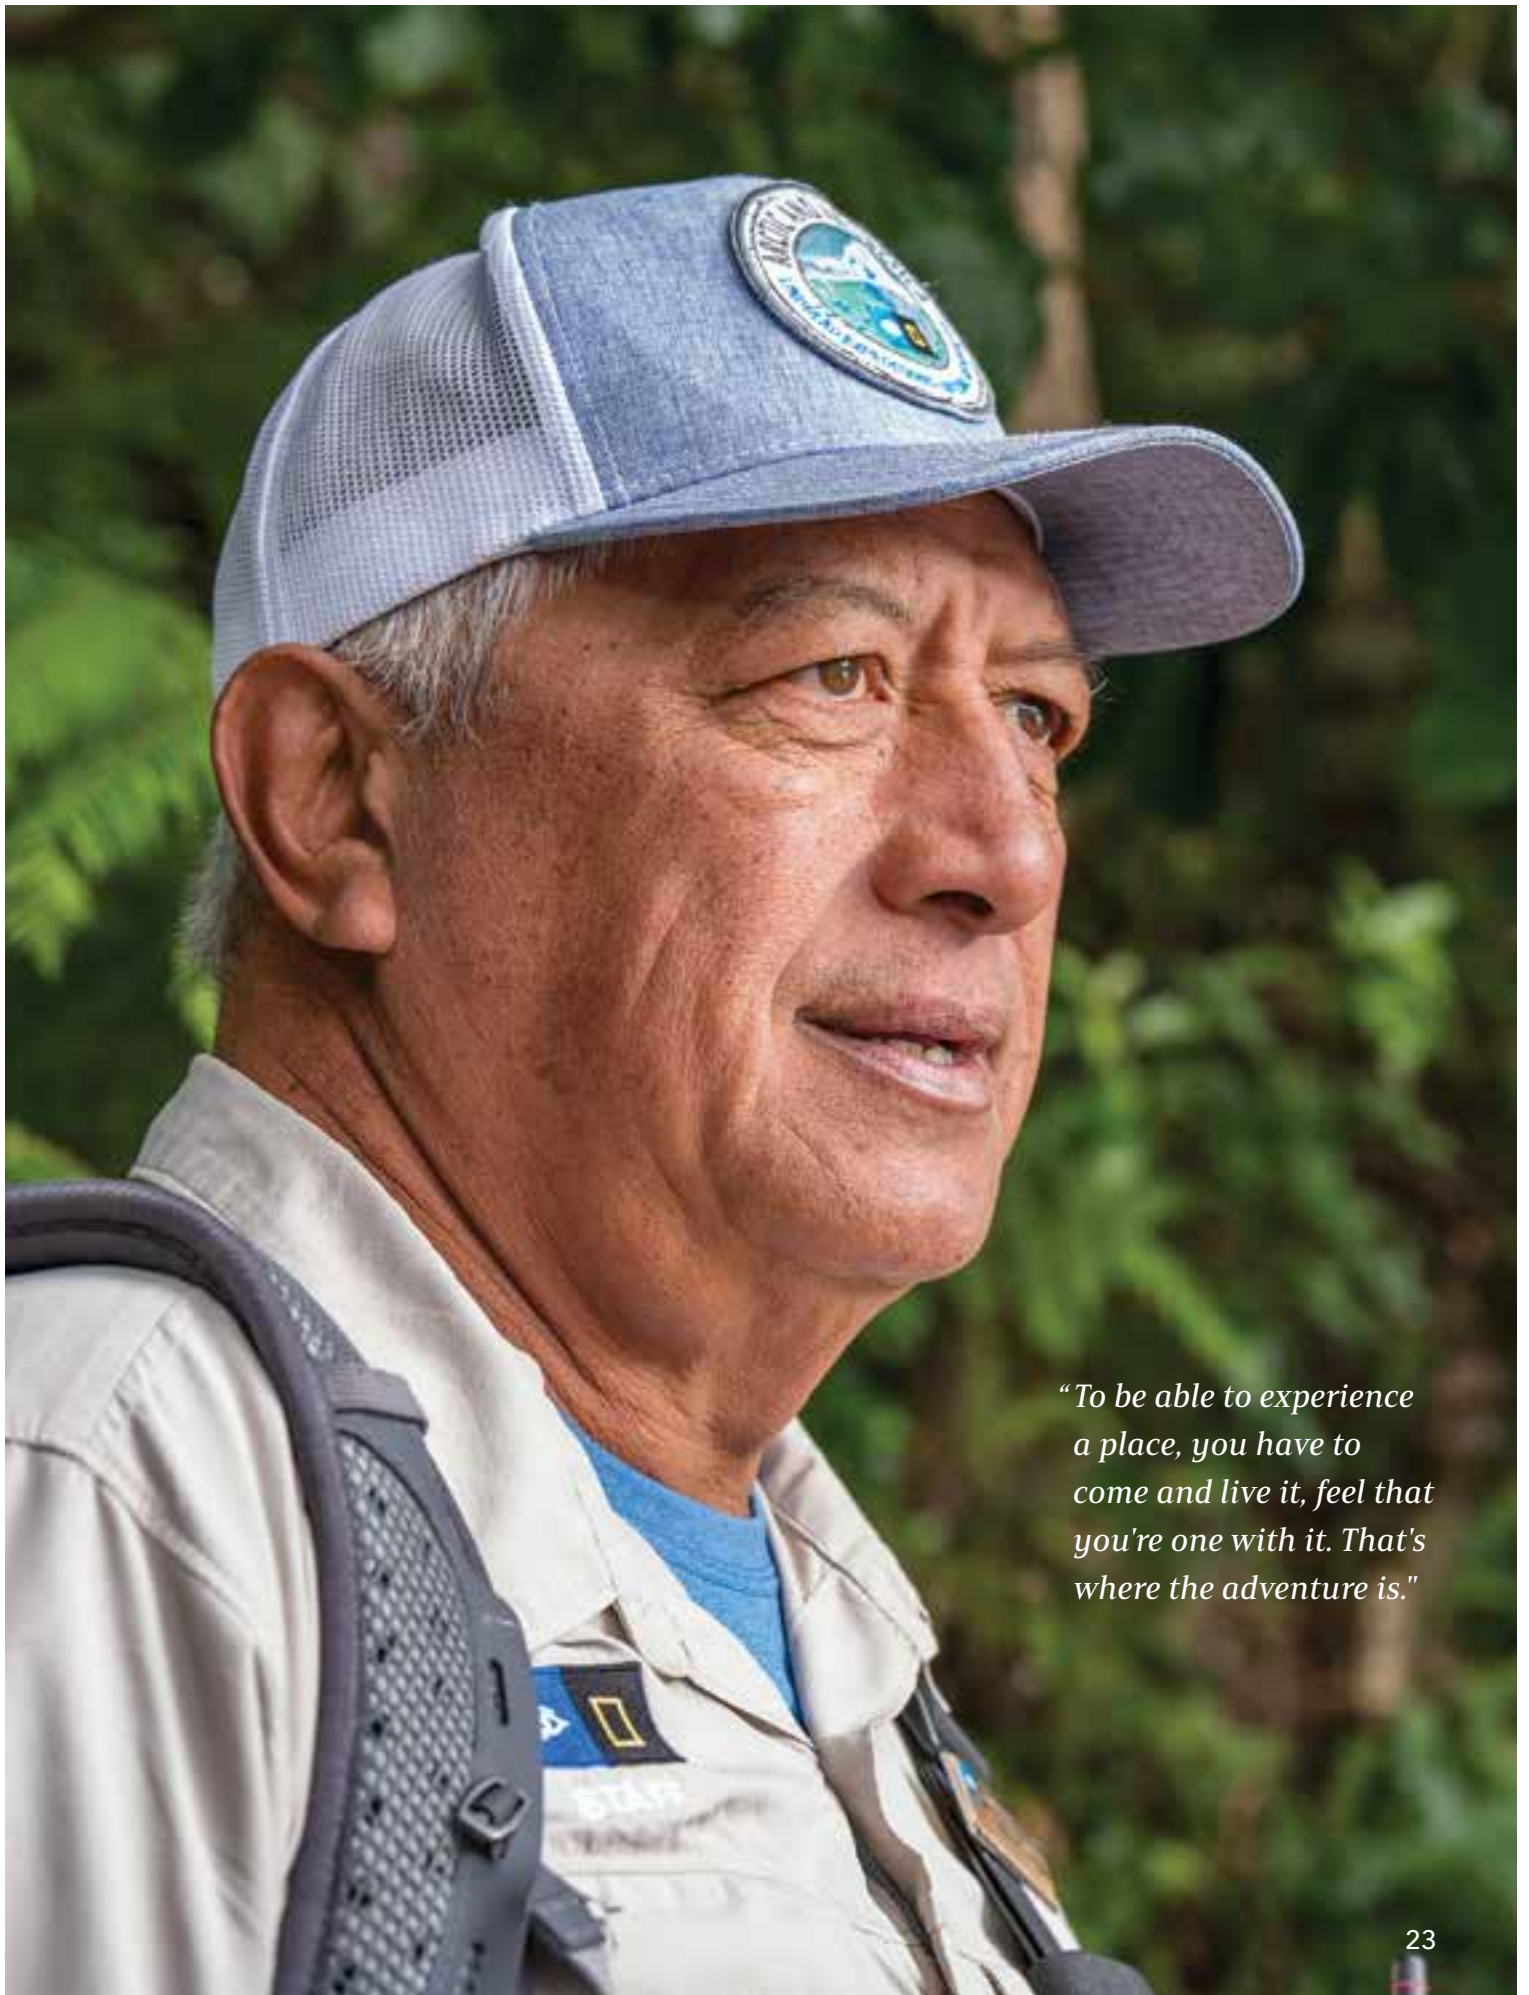

As a master navigator, Pittman is a guardian of traditional Polynesian wayfinding techniques—and perhaps an unlikely one. After losing his father and grandfather to a fishing accident when he was only five years old, his childhood in the Cook Islands was marked by a deep fear of the ocean. But that changed at age 18, when he was invited to join a voyaging crew. He decided to face his fears.

Today, Pittman is one of only 10 master navigators in the South Pacific. As he puts it, “The ocean is my home. I spend more time at sea than I do on land.” He has a profound appreciation for the navigational achievements of his Polynesian ancestors—a reverence he brings to his work with Lindblad Expeditions-National Geographic. “I’m passionate about sharing insight into the cultures of the places we visit: the history, the traditions, the ancestry. I feel so happy when a guest says to me, ‘This was amazing. Now I understand who the Polynesian people are.’”

BEYOND THE PAGE

Watch our full interview with Tua Pittman and learn more about our recent cultural exchanges in the South Pacific.

“To be able to experience a place, you have to come and live it, feel that you’re one with it. That’s where the adventure is.”

“What’s exciting about National Geographic right now is that they’re looking at exploration through every lens. If you look at the community of explorers, more and more you will find people from all over the world. They’re helping renew my ideas about what exploration and storytelling can be.”

National Geographic Expert

DISTINGUISHED PHOTOGRAPHERS, SCIENTISTS, AND STORYTELLERS SEEKING SOLUTIONS TO CHALLENGES IN THE PLANET'S MOST FRAGILE PLACES

Jennifer Kingsley

20 years of experience

Jennifer Kingsley likes to get to know her destination one resident at a time. In 2017, the National Geographic Society awarded her a grant to do just that for the final phase of her storytelling project, Meet the North. Over the course of three years, Kingsley traveled through six Arctic countries, following the narrative threads of local people. "Every single person has a great story. The real expertise in the regions we visit comes from the people who call those places home."

Kingsley brings this reverence for local knowledge to the expeditions she joins aboard our fleet. She uses her experience forging personal connections to foster meaningful cultural encounters for travelers. That could mean arranging community visits and shipboard activities or translating at a market or festival. She describes these interactions as an "unexpected dimension" of our voyages for travelers.

"Very often our guests will come to a region for one reason—usually scenery or wildlife—and end up with the strongest memories about something totally different. In my experience, that's often culture. There's this huge emphasis on once-in-a-lifetime experiences, but it can be even more meaningful to encounter something familiar—like being actively welcomed onto a Polynesian island we've visited before. These moments are especially powerful if you understand what you're a part of: the geography, the moment in history, how people got there in the first place. That's the kind of context travelers can expect when we explore together."

Hotel Manager

ENSURING YOU ENJOY THE LUXURY OF COMFORT ABOARD OUR EXPEDITION FLEET

“I believe our shared heart is the ocean—and the ship helps people feel connected in the experience of sailing on the ocean together.”

Françoise Said—or Fran, as National Geographic Orion guests affectionately call her—pours champagne during cocktail hour.

Françoise Said

14 years of experience

“For me, to be on the ship is to be at home.” National Geographic Orion Hotel Manager Françoise Said strives to make everyone on board—crew and guests alike—feel this same sense of comfort at sea. “It’s the small gestures that make people feel special, like giving a behind-the-scenes tour to the ship enthusiasts or delivering hot chocolate to the Zodiacs during a chilly excursion. Those are the moments they remember.”

Said’s career aspirations came from a curiously ironic source: the blockbuster movie Titanic, which she first saw as a teenager growing up in Germany. The scenes depicting society on the high seas captivated her. “I was drawn to the idea of making connections with people around the world,” she says.

Friendships come easy for Said, who is full of zest and quick with a smile. She credits her relationships with people in each port of call with the rich ambience she creates on board National Geographic Orion. She is masterful at bringing a destination directly to her guests—on a recent journey through the Marquesas Islands, she convinced nearly two dozen local musicians to share their talents in onboard concerts.

“I think this ship has a very special soul,” Said muses, before graciously accepting that she might be the heart of it.

Head Chef

BRINGING YOU INNOVATIVE MENUS AND RESPONSIBLY SOURCED FARE

Michael Stork

12 years of experience

When Gordon Ramsay Steak Las Vegas wouldn't give Michael Stork an interview, the recent Cordon Bleu grad showed up at the restaurant three days in a row until they relented and offered him a job on the line. After a decade working in Sin City's fine-dining scene—including a stint as sous chef at the two-starred Michelin spot, Restaurant Guy Savoy—Stork is now a head chef aboard our U.S. fleet.

"I have complete creative freedom, but I have to play chess when it comes to ordering," he says. That's because the ship picks up ingredients from local purveyors as it sails, rather than solely stocking up at ports. On a recent Costa Rican voyage, Chef Stork procured a fresh catch from a fisherman's beachfront stand. "We got the biggest red snapper I've ever seen. I served it at dinner that night—the guests said it was the best snapper they had ever tasted."

Local ingredients are key to Chef Stork's fusion style, which blends familiar American flavors with the novel produce he sees in markets across Central and North America. For instance, he recently put together a citrus salad featuring pejibaye, a palm fruit popular in Costa Rica. "I always ask the naturalists how ingredients are traditionally used so we can showcase the local culture, which is central to our dining experience—and then I add my own flair."

Fresh Perspectives on New Zealand From a National Geographic Photography Expert

National Geographic Photography Expert Ricky Qi is always looking for new ways of seeing, and a recent voyage through New Zealand and the Subantarctic islands offered plenty of fresh perspectives. Qi reflects, “It’s an experience that takes you out of the wagon ruts of your mind and puts you on open grassland.” Here, he recounts memories from an expedition that, in his words, “is absolutely epic.”

New Zealand and the Subantarctic islands are places that we go to reconnect with nature. They have some of the planet’s last pieces of untrammled land, and wildlife that can’t be found anywhere else, including many plants and animals that are endemic to the region.

The virgin forests, huge fjords, and crystal-clear waters are a landscape photographer’s dream. The light, especially in the Subantarctic, is also really special—very atmospheric, very moody. You can experience all four seasons in a single day or, sometimes, in a single hour. This creates a lot of variability in how you photograph. Even if you’re shooting the same subject, it will look different under the different variations of light.

Being here can sometimes feel unreal, almost like a simulation. When we visited the fjord at Milford Sound, it was such a bluebird day—I tried to take it in, but it almost felt like my eyes were tricking me.

There’s something particularly primordial about the Subantarctic islands. You land on these black-sand volcanic beaches and there are thousands of penguins nesting in a colony that has existed for millennia, maybe before the Romans or the Pharaohs. It gives you a new perspective on the stories of these isles and how your visit is just a tiny blip in their fascinating histories.
